

The zero benchmark is the correct population forecast and the fitted model is pure estimation noise, so neither test should fire more than five percent of the time. The squared-error comparison declares the fitted model significantly worse in up to all of the replications: the finding that a fitted model 'loses to the null' is produced by the act of fitting, not by the data. Clark--West holds its level.