

An expectation is not a critical value

What the grid really searched

Left: a skill-free grid clears the False Strategy Theorem's expected maximum about half the time at every level of dependence, because that threshold is an expectation; the synchronised bootstrap quantile of the same grid holds the nominal level. Right: the 72 configurations behave like the independent-trial count shown, which collapses towards one as the trials come to share their data.